CD DUCASSE
PARIS

Alain Ducasse enjoys legendary status in the world of gastronomy. With an extensive portfolio of restaurants all over the world, a series of cookbooks, a cooking school, a cooking consultancy, and more Michelin stars than most chefs would know what to do with, he is like a one-man industry that seemingly never stops. But it is his food at flagship restaurants like Louis XV at the Hotel de Paris in Monaco, and Alain Ducasse at The Dorchester, that really sets him apart as one of the world's best chefs.

Born in 1956 on a farm in the Landes region, Alain Ducasse discovered the tastes of produce at an early age. At 16, the young cook entered a restaurant in France's southwest, then left to train with chefs such as Michel Guérard, Gaston Lenôtre, Alain Chapel and Roger Vergé, with whom he discovered provincial cuisine. For almost five decades he has been chasing perfection on a quest that has taken him through the ranks at a number of French kitchens as a young chef, to being the first chef to own three-Michelin-star restaurants in three cities. He developed a fascination with Provençal cuisine in the late 1970s while working at Le Moulin de Mougins, and went on to win his first Michelin star as head chef at La Terrasse at the Hotel Juana in Juan les Pins.

Shortly after receiving two Michelin stars at La Terrasse in 1984, Ducasse was involved in a plane crash in the French Alps, in which he was the sole survivor. He has described lying in the snow for seven hours, bleeding and waiting to be rescued, as dying without dying. The experience drove him on to find purpose in every aspect of his life. In 1987, as chef de cuisine at Le Louis XV at the Hotel de Paris in Monaco, he won his first three Michelin stars – making it the first hotel in the guide's history to do so.

It was in Monaco that Ducasse developed what was to become one of his most famous signature dishes – rum baba. Presented under a silver cloche, the perfectly moist sponge is doused with fine and rare rum before being topped with a dollop of rich vanilla cream. Another classic Ducasse dish is the Cookpot de legumes de saison, which features his favourite seasonal vegetables, which remind him of helping out as a child in his grandmother’s garden. To celebrate 25-years at Le Louis XV, he created a dish of gamberoni from San Remo, with a delicate rockfish jelly and three generous servings of caviar.

His restaurant operation spans the globe, from Las Vegas to Tokyo. In 2007 he opened Alain Ducasse at The Dorchester in London, and by 2010 it had won three Michelin stars. He has restaurants in destinations as diverse as Doha, Beirut and Macau, and he spends a great deal of his time flying between them all to guide their progress and ensure the high standards that have become synonymous with his name. As such, it has been said of Ducasse that he was the first genuinely remote chef, turning management from a distance into something of an art form.

But despite the size and reach of his empire, Ducasse always remains true to his overarching philosophy of humanist cuisine. Although each restaurant in each destination is different, reflecting the unique aesthetic and energy of its place, they all have the same connections between nature and humanity. For Ducasse, it is the role of the growers, producers and chefs to build those connections, while promoting strong values of open-mindedness, tolerance, generosity and sharing. Ducasse also proposes an innovative vision of Haute Cuisine, inspired by nature and respect for fish and agricultural resources.

Ducasse was awarded three times by James Beard Foundation. In 2001 as Best New Restaurant, in 2002 as Who's Who of Food & Beverage in America and in 2007 as Cooking from a Professional point of view. In 2013, Ducasse was awarded the Lifetime Achievement award by the World's 50 Best restaurants, sealing his place in the pantheon of great chefs. Indeed, for any young chef starting out in the world of restaurants, Alain Ducasse is a name that conjures images of the very finest haute cuisine in the most palatial of restaurants. What's more, it is a name that will always be known for the tireless pursuit of excellence, a voracious appetite for discovery, and the ambition to fulfill great potential. But it is also a name that inspires chefs to cook in the right way, and with the very best of intentions.

Michelin-starred chef Alain Ducasse’s latest culinary endeavor is a fantasia inside a Zaha Hadid Architects–designed hotel in Macau. At Alain Ducasse at Morpheus, the décor is as sparkling and piquant as a glass of Moët: Blown-glass tubes cascade from the silvery ceiling to divvy the 7,000 square feet into discrete zones. LED-lit from inside to impart a flattering, ambient glow, the icicles seem to drip into reflecting pools that wend around the dining room’s periphery. The custom lighting elements “glisten like water, creating a shimmering forest that blurs our understanding of the space,” says Interior Design Hall of Fame member Patrick Jouin, who oversaw the project with co-partner Sanjit Manku. It’s an exceedingly rarefied way to carve the eatery into sanctums that feel indulgently sheltering but not too compartmentalized. The restaurant layout is equally fluid, unfurling in a curvilinear path around mirror-clad structural columns that hide in plain sight. The floor plan of the main dining area reads as a series of overlapping circles, a trio of them at the edge forming semiprivate suites. Each suite centers on an illuminated crystalline table programmed to dim at the end of the meal, at which time a glass screen slides open and reveals a secret salon to which guests can retire for a round or two of bubbly.

Paying homage to the great traditions and savoir-faire of French gastronomy, Alain Ducasse at Morpheus redefines fine dining with a contemporary vision and a sentimental approach to cooking. Located in Macau's Morpheus hotel, the restaurant, designed by Patrick Jouin and Sanjit Manku, is an atmosphere of elegance that marries classic with tailored creations. It features unique pieces, like the otherworldly wooden sculptures of Pascal Oudet or an array of vintage kitchenware and tableware from Alain Ducasse's personal collection.

Through a cascade of hypnotic bubbling crystal chandeliers, we entered the gastronomic palace of Alain Ducasse where the hallucinating avant-garde beauteousness marries the aristocratic temperament. As we are ushered through the dining room, we find our unique semi-enclosed space where all the magic of tonight will take place. We are seated at a bar-functioned table where we rest and wait for the show to unfold, almost as if we are having a pre-theatre dinner before the former dinner show.

Without long anticipation, a trio of canapé is served right away. Chef Alain Ducasse's Monacan background and his southern French and Basque style can be no more clearly stated in the very first bites of the night. First served is a duet of tartelette, featuring a squid ink tartelette with piperade and lightly torched squid and a tartelette with sweet corn puree topped with dry black olive and cardamon shaving. Alongside the tartelettes are some barbajuans, a fritter that originates from Monaco. The petit barbajuans are stuffed with swiss chard and ricotta as per tradition, with an additional touch of spinach and marjoram.

As we transport ourselves to the dinner table, a modernistic trolley loaded with bread and a pyramid of butter arrives. An artisan mini baguette and a brioche-like rich and heavenly soft Parker house roll are served, yet the main star on the trolley is a more rustic artisan bread made of rice flour by the famous Chambelland bakery in Paris. Chewier on the mouth, the bread is mosaicked with sunflower seed, sesame seed, and poppy seed, resulting in a blessing barnyard aroma. All the bread is served with the prestigious French Pascal Beillevoire butter freshly scooped from the butter pyramid on the trolley.

A dignified degustation journey should only be refined and fully enjoyed with the pairing of fine wine. As the dinner starts to unfold, a glass of Dom Perignon P2 vintage 2002 is presented. With the help of the white wine glass, a subtle bouquet of fresh citrusy and herbal tones rises from the glass. Notes of lemongrass, yuzu, and lemon indicate its juvenile freshness, whereas sharp salinity and rustic minerality dominate the juice on the palate.

The table is soon further arrayed with a trio of amuse bouche displayed in three delicate spheres. Inside the bronze matte sphere rests sweet potato tempura served with a medley of spinach, peanut, and citrus. Following the first vegetarian bite is the smoked octopus paired with red and yellow beetroot, presented in the shiny grey marble sphere. The final amuse bouche in the snow-white porcelain sphere transfers us from the sea back to land again with dry-aged speck ham served with endive and mornay sauce.

Just as we finished the trio of amuse bouche, the sommelier comes with another glass of bubbles: a rare Krug Rosé 23ème Édition Brut. Krug carries a more refined texture, allowing my palate to lounge in its frothy bubble bath with accents of the ripe fruitiness of marmalade and persimmon as well as the juvenile yet refreshing acidity of tomato. Now as Dom Perignon p2 is doubled with Krug rose, I'm engulfed in this heavenly tsunami of effervescence, enlivened by the twofold obstreperous indulgence and luminous ecstasy.

Before being drenched in the hallucinating bubbles, my attention is soon caught by the next dish, a bowl of prestigious gold caviar on top of a bed of sunflower-shaped delicate saffron-infused rockfish gelée and precious Mediterranean carabinero shrimp. Caviar and seafood gelée never goes wrong, as witnessed in many notorious dishes including the caviar and crab dish by Joel Robuchon and the signature caviar dish served at Caprice in Hong Kong. Nevertheless, this miraculous caviar dish by Alain Ducasse is at another level. Tsunamis of oceanic umami and outrageously fresh sweetness from the carabinero are further underscored by the saffron which transfers the dish to a completely reformed modern bouillabaisse dish.

Ensuing the caviar dish are two appetizers, both of which come with a side dish to form a gustatory planet-moon system. The first set centers on an Escabèche style sous-vide white asparagus, marinated and served with a bottarga and miso sauce. Alongside the dish is a plate of shaved Philadelphia cheese, spelt cracker, and a dark spelt reduction. The white asparagus carries a delicately sweet tone and a hint of bitterness on top of its grassy freshness, underscored by a bottarga miso sauce that showcases not only the intriguing fusion of Japanese and Mediterranean cuisine but a perfect marriage of the sophisticated mellow sweet miso and the slightly piquant and pungent fish roe delicacy. A glass of Boisson-Vadot 'Pierre Boisson' Meursault 2015 is offered to pair with the white asparagus dish. Exhibiting a medley of citrus, grass, acacia, honey, and a hint of mint and green tea, the juice reads rather light-bodied and highly acidic on the mouth. An additional twist aromas of lemon black tea and pickled plum waft from the glass after a while, yet the iconic salinity and minerality seem to be a nonentity.

Next up is a fish dish featuring line-caught sea bass. The main part of the dish consists of two stripes of perfectly executed sea bass showered by creamy milk of seaweed béarnaise, accented with the extra oceanic aroma of sea kelp and sea asparagus. The satellite dish is centered on cauliflower, finished with razor clam, cauliflower dashi, squid, and seaweed that echoes the main dish. Thanks to the perfect wedlock with the oriental ocean flavor, the common continental fish dish is elevated to another dimension. To pair with the delightful fish, a glass of refined and elegant burgundy white is presented. The Lucien le Moine Puligny-Montrachet is definitely a more sweet-dominant nectar, yet it screams perfect minerality as well. With a hint of wheat, the juice showcases a brilliant floral core of jasmine injected with plum-tomato dashi.

The next set of dishes centers on sucking pig finally makes its appearance at the table, marking the final scene of the savory part. In a similar manner as the previous ones, the dish features a main dish of suckling pig, with two side dishes. Chef Cedric Satabin, an apprentice of Alain Ducasse and chef de cuisine here at Alain Ducasse at Morpheus, carefully selects three cuts from the suckling pig, namely the pork rack, the shoulder, and the leg. We are thus able to luxuriate in the utmost presence of the suckling pig. The modern sous-vide cooking technique bestows an impeccable tenderness upon the sucking pig, which together with its mesmerizing creamy pork aroma, constitutes a rare multi-sensational approach on the tongue. Paired with baby carrots and wild black trumpet mushroom, then showered with a mellow jus and a sprinkle of black truffle and nori powder, the suckling pig is further blessed with a classical French kiss. The French imprint is carried onto the first side dish, a small cup of wild black trumpets mushroom rissoles. The second side dish, in contrast, showcases an exotic touch by immersing the suckling pig gelée in a grotesque kimchi foam. A glass of 2014 chateau Pavie is offered to pair with the course. Smoky and earthy, the dark ruby wine divulges a strong waft of underbrush and dark fruity notes, with a peculiar yet fascinating hint of gummy candy.

Before entering the luxurious fest of sweetness, a cheese course is offered.

Unlike most traditional French restaurants where we would expect a trolley of cheese to be enjoyed pristinely with honey or jam, the cheese course here is rather another flamboyant creation of the chef. The cheese course features the prestigious 36 months aged Comté Grande Garde exceptionnelle, which is presented in two forms. In a J. L. Coquet hemisphere bowl rests a medley of diced comté, comté foam, reduction of vin jaune, chives, and bread crumbs. On the side plate, however, is an original form of the cheese, served with grissini with almond powder.

Considering that the aged comté carries a sharp spiciness and nutty salinity, not to mention the extra long 36-month aging process that bestows an extra pungent depth on the cheese, the vin jaune jus, and the chives simply add another layer of heaviness to the whole, resulting in the unbearable burden on the palate. The 30 years Graham's tawny port that is supposed to enliven the cheese course tasting process, also oozes serious heaviness that encumbers the tasting buds.

While my mouth is being pickled by the plethora of saltiness from the cheese course, it is soon irritated again by the excessive bitterness in the following clementine dessert. Showcasing textures of the clementine, the dessert consists of clementine sorbet, confit clementine, clementine jus, clementine peel, and clementine powder, which are further underscored by vanilla, cereal, sunflower seed, flaxseed, sesame, and poppy seed. Even though the dessert does wash off the saltiness from the last cheese course by brimming my tongue with a refreshing citrusy tone, the tangerine peel reveals an immoderate amount of bitterness to the whole. Such unpleasant taste can not be saved even with the gorgeous pairing of a glass of clementine juice mixed with sparkling water and Mandarine Napoléon liqueur and a glass of nectareous 2000 Chateau Coutet.

After a frenzied ride on the roller coaster, my overwhelmed palate finally finds serendipity in the next dessert course. It is the ultimate star in nearly all the luxurious Alain Ducasse restaurants across the world, it is the most notorious creation of the legendary chef, it is the utmost form of the traditional French dessert — Alain Ducasse’s signature Baba au rhum “like in Monte-Carlo.” Nestling in an aristocratic silverware, the mesmerizing baba pastry glazed with apricot nappage is cut right in front of you before mingling with a scoop of the exquisite chantilly cream accented with the most refined Madagascan vanilla bean. Most significantly, the pastry is further drenched in an extremely rare rum crafted exclusively for the Alain Ducasse restaurants. Costing over a thousand dollars per bottle, the superb HSE Rhum Vieux Agricole Grande Réserve Vieilli en Fûts de Chêne is unarguably the most prestigious version of rum. Radiating infinite oomph, the rum fertilizes the medley with its sophisticated aromas of mocha, amber, tobacco, and cocoa that are reminiscent of the temperament of Monte-Carlo.

With a short visit to the wine cellar, the chef’s table chamber, and the kitchen, we are back at the table for the final indulgences. A mignardise trolley appears in front of us, on which our final dessert is made. The waitress prepares a marmalade which is made of rhubarb and hibiscus, which is then topped with some almonds and biscuits, and finish with rhubarb sorbet. The last bite of sweetness is a chocolate tablet made of 75% dark chocolate, in which we could also find crispy wild rice, hazelnut, and sea salt. A box of chocolate cake and the printed menu for us to take home finally arrive at the table, calling the end for the fabulous degustation journey of ultimate indulgence.
